Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: ...propose should bear upon it the maximum number of persons to be allowed to sleep on board, and any infringement of it should involve a penalty. This, at all events, would prevent such scandalous cases of overcrowding as frequently occur at the present time, and indirectly, I think, would have an important influence in promoting elementary instruction among the children. A limitation being put upon the number of persons to be accommodated in a cabin, the immediate result would be to send many families at once ashore. In other cases the children of school age would probably be boarded with friends and relations. They would then come under the jurisdiction of the local school board, and their attendance at school under a compulsory byelaw could at once be enforced. There is no doubt whatever that the cabin accommodation in a canal barge forms a part of the wages paid to the bargeman. Were the effect of such a license as I have suggested to be to reduce the value of this consideration, there is little doubt that, in the present state of the labour market, an equivalent in the shape of an increase in the money wages paid would at once be given. I am inclined to the opinion, therefore, that the enforcement of such a regulation as I have suggested would inflict no hardship upon the bargeman or his family. XII.--The hours of attendance in retail shops in London and in the larger towns of my district vary so much according to the locality and to the nature of the business carried on that I find it difficult to classify them and define them satisfactorily. In the Metropolis women may be found in attendance on customers in retail places of business of one kind or another at almost any hour in the 24 that may be named; but, while the hours of labour are so irregular,
